We contacted a Mexican guy from the Cesar Chavez movement who had a van. Then we gathered a mob of street people and as many others as were available to perform a furious protest against the out of town DES office. It seem like everybody was taking turns carrying the petrified baby sign. We scared 'em alright, and while we had 'em cornered in an attack mode, we hauled out some demand signs to get food stamps for disqualified homeless children. Along the highway, honking automobile horns shattered the smoldering silence.

A baldheaded, congenial character chuckled sympathetically, seated on a piece of cardboard with his legs crossed. He was wearing an army green karate outfit, like a colorless clown, eating a grapefruit. Juice dripped off his chin. "Ahh..." he groaned, "the concrete was especially hard last night."

Dud held up three fingers, he swore, "There were three cans— three, not one— not two, but three cans of pure lard!" His mouth clamped shut and his dark eyes glittered with bitterness.

A frazzled woman poked her head out of the swinging doors, he glared at her, "Letha, I told you to stay in the bus and keep those kids quiet. Bets can do the laundry. Now get back in there, get that mess cleaned up or pack your suitcase, like I said."

Rita snapped, "So help me, God. Somebody better hold me back. Give me a split-second and I'd help that poor soul kick his butt."

Joel James jerked Connie up by the lapels of her shirt with his fist. In a slow dangerous tone, he said, "Lady, if you think this girl touched your damn laundry, you are badly mistaken. She is the laziest girl I've ever known. She won't even pick up her own dirty clothes that she drops all over the house!" When he turned Connie loose, she smiled at him sweetly as if she wasn't used to people jumping so gallantly to her defense.
