Judge Me By The People Who Surround Me: The Obama Challenge Barbara Bluefield

Candidate Obama in 2008 challenged Americans to judge him by the people he associated himself with. This book will answer that challenge. His childhood and his family gave him an early vision of what America is or should be. What were the ideas that Obama learned as a child? As a young adult he proudly states he selected his friends carefully. Who did he select to be associated with and what was their political and religious ideology? Who did he choose to help him in his political ambitions and who did he pick to work with him in Washington? This book explores these questions and the answers may be surprising to some. The reader will learn information that has had limited coverage in the main stream media. His opinions and the opinions of his friends may be those you share, or maybe not. You will discover whether or not you agree with his vision of America as it is now and how he Hopes to Change America. Decide if his goal of Hope and Change is what you envisioned during the last campaign. Decide if his goal of Hope and Change is what you want in the future.
