Nowadays many of the most widely-read popular science books, are written by celebrity fantasists who spend half the book titillating the reader by telling him how mystical and incomprehensible the universe is; and the other half assuring him that brilliant geniuses, like the author himself, understand the universe so perfectly that they are absolutely certain what it was like a fraction of a second after the big bang. In addition they often try to convince the reader that the most outrageous ideas from science fiction, such as time travel and teleportation, are really possible, and so belong in the domain of physics. Of course the reason the celebrity fantasists write such meaningless drivel, is that their readership are all too eager to pay them to do it. Provided this charade takes place between consenting adults, then probably no crime has been committed. But it does make it hard for anybody to write a proper scientific book about the universe; because physics-believers have developed such a devout religious belief in imaginary beings like quarks, gluons, dark matter, and the Higgs field, that any attempt to make sense of the universe, is met with screams of 'blasphemy', 'heresy' and 'crackpottery'. On the other hand, writing science fiction is hardly made any easier by the fact that the physics-fantasists have stolen its the most outrageous ideas about the universe, and claimed that they are really possible. Since the celebrity physics-fantasists are selling fourth-rate science fiction by claiming it is physics; what if somebody were to try to turn the tables, and write a science fiction book which contained ingenious new ideas about the structure of the universe? Would that work? I very much doubt it. But them again, a human is just a complicated chemical reaction, and life is just an experiment, so I may as well give it a try.
